Persistent vegetative state (PVS) is defined by the absence of any sign of consciousness, except reflexive eye movements, and is characterized by a bilaterally symmetrical constellation of clinical symptoms and signs that persist over a long period. PVS is associated with the decorticate catatonic state, which has neurophysiological correlates. Indeed, in the decorticate catatonic state, cortical electroencephalography (EEG) shows a "negative" electro-oculogram and a general decrease in cortical activity. The aims of the present study are to examine the neurophysiological correlates of PVS and to explore whether these correlates differ from those of other catatonic states. A full-field, 31-channel EEG montage was used to measure the background activity and the cortico-electro-mechan
